Tampa's Cigar Factories Part 1

It is impossible to understate the importance cigar manufacturing had on the development of Tampa. In the late 1800s and early 1900s, hundreds of cigar companies relocated to the Florida Gulf Coast city and tens of thousands of Cubans, Italians, Jews, and Spaniards immigrated there.

Factory owners built ornate, three-story brick factories in the Cigar City and nearby locales that towered like castles over the flat terrain. The rectangular buildings were constructed lengthwise from east to west with many windows to allow in natural light. Larger windows were located on the north sides to better capture breezes. The setups were generally the same for all. Tobacco was stored in the basement. The first floor contained offices and was where tobacco was brought in and finished cigars were sent out. The cigars were rolled on the second floor, and tobacco leaves were prepared and graded on the top floor.

Tampa's cigar industry thrived into the 1920s and 1930s, but the invention of the cigar roller, frequent worker strikes, and the increased popularity of the cigarette led to its slow decline. The Great Depression and World War II expedited the cigar industry's downfall, and now only a handful of companies still produce cigars in Tampa.

As the cigar companies went out of business, owners sold their factories to other enterprises. The spacious floor plans made great warehouses, but the buildings were often poorly maintained. Of the more than 300 cigar factories built in Tampa, about 90 percent have been torn down and only 24 stand today.

Nine of the former factories are located within the locally designated Ybor City Historic District—a National Register landmark district—and are regulated by the Barrio Latino Commission. In 2003, when there were 26 surviving factories, Tampa's Historic Preservation Commission attempted to locally designate 15 of the 26 unprotected former factories. However, the owners of five of the buildings objected and sued the city. They said it was not fair for their properties to be designated even if they did not want it. The city's designation efforts stalled, and in 2006 the city amended its code to consider the wishes of historic building owners who did not want designation. However, it does not allow them to opt out.

Direction makes a difference...

As with most cigar factories, its length runs east to west so sunlight and breezes stream into north and south windows all day long.

Windows on the north side are larger than on the south side. Constant air flow is created as breezes move into large openings and out of the building through smaller openings.

Many of this architectural & engineering details were copies of the buildings in the south east United States.
